

FEMALES AND KARATE SPORT MANAGEMENT

Abstract

Socially speaking, women represent a specific and respectably large group, which is manifested in sports in a particular way. Sex differentiation is noticeable both in general social structure and in sports, and it still causes limited participation of women in all sports activities. The same applies to karate, when certain relationships important for sports activities and participation in those sports are considered, it is obvious that sex differentiation plays a significant role with regard to the outcome and quality of a particular activity. It goes without saying that both men and women can go in for karate as competitors or through different engagements, especially sports management. However, practice proves that obvious biological, as well as other social differences can significantly influence the progress, quality and effects of a particular activity. The discriminative ratio of women in karate makes it very clear that this issue is prevalent in our society.
